Litigation Drains Value

Litigation diverts attention from core product development and strategic initiatives. Public filings and extensive discovery processes require significant coordination across legal, engineering, and executive teams, eroding focus on roadmap milestones and customer commitments.

Extended disputes often generate cumulative costs with legal fees, internal resource allocation, and missed commercial opportunities that can surpass the value of the contested claim. For this reason, many organizations pursue accelerated, cost-effective dispute resolution to preserve momentum, protect partnerships, and minimize operational disruption.

Control and Privacy

Mediation is a voluntary, confidential process facilitated by a neutral third-party mediator that enables parties to negotiate outside of public court proceedings. The private nature of mediation preserves sensitive information including patent arbitration, trade secrets, and product roadmaps, while reducing the scope of formal discovery and public filings.

Parties retain full control over the outcome, drafting a mutually acceptable settlement that can include tailored remedies such as licensing arrangements, royalty structures, cross-licenses, or non-compete terms. Mediation typically reduces time and legal expense, and when properly documented the settlement is enforceable, providing a pragmatic path to resolution that protects strategic assets and business relationships.

Litigation is an adversarial, public process adjudicated by a judge or jury, where outcomes are determined through formal court procedures. The litigation pathway typically triggers wide-ranging discovery obligations, deposition schedules, and public filings that can disclose sensitive technical and commercial information.

Decisions and remedies are imposed by the tribunal rather than collaboratively crafted by the parties, which can result in remedies that do not align with commercial priorities. The public nature of proceedings increases reputational risk and can damage or terminate strategic relationships; confidentiality cannot be assured except where the court permits limited sealing or protective orders. Costs and timelines are often unpredictable, placing additional strain on operational resources and executive attention.

Mediation preserves control, privacy, and business relationships.

Faster, Cheaper Mediation

Engaging a certified patent mediator in Florida accelerates dispute resolution while preserving confidentiality and reducing overall expense compared with traditional litigation. Mediation enables parties to maintain control over commercial remedies, protect sensitive intellectual property from public record, and avoid protracted discovery burdens that divert engineering and executive resources.

Upon engagement, Brian delivers a formal mediation plan outlining process steps, recommended participants, and confidentiality protocols. He also provides a detailed fee estimate and a proposed schedule within two weeks, enabling clients to evaluate costs, timing, and strategic impact before committing to the mediation pathway. Predictable timelines and cost containment are emphasized to keep resolution aligned with business objectives.

Engage for Assessment

Initiate a case evaluation with Brian Gilchrist to assess merits, identify key issues, and determine suitability for mediation. The assessment includes a review of technical records, claim scope, and commercial objectives to align the dispute strategy with business priorities.

Within few days of engagement you will receive a formal mediation proposal that contains a customized mediation plan, a detailed fee estimate, and a proposed timeline with milestone dates. The proposal clarifies participant roles, confidentiality protocols, and expected outcomes to facilitate informed decision-making.
